RESEARCH PROFILE

How can the human capital investment in India be channelized to reap benefits of high population to achieve economic growth?

The research presents a positive relationship between the investment towards education and human capital on the Human Capital Index Scale. The research uses literature to showcase the positive correlation between high-investing countries and HCI levels. Bailey Bosworth and Kennedy's research has showcased the difference between occupational mobility and resource distribution in the American and Indian economies. Literature is subsequently also used to portray and create comparisons between the distinct scenarios in which a country may implement human capital investment in the economy.

The impact of cognitive biases on financial decisions made by teenagers:

The paper looks into the different ways in which cognitive biases have an impact on financial decision-making by teenagers. The data for the paper was collected through a questionnaire I designed. The questionnaire was based on Tim Vipond's proposed - "10 types of cognitive biases that influence decision-making in financial matters." The research concluded that the impact is largely visible on teenagers that portray traits of being overconfident, and those who are susceptible to peer pressure and anchoring bias.
